Nebraska State Historical Society Tells Story of New Deal Artwork
Select Nebraska Post Offices Form Statewide Gallery

Lincoln, Neb. — As a part of the New Deal that offered hope during the Great Depression, scores of public art projects were commissioned around the country. Now they are among the most enduring visual legacies of that era. Twelve Nebraska post offices were chosen to receive individualized murals from the program. Nebraska's Post Office Murals: Born of the Depression, Fostered by the New Deal is a new book from the Nebraska State Historical Society (NSHS) that presents the story of these valuable historical pieces.

Richly illustrated with color fold-outs and never-before-published artists' sketches, the book reveals the personalities, conflicts, and spirit of the times from which the art emerged. Each of the artists commissioned to paint the murals had a background story. Author Robert Puschendorf, NSHS associate director and the deputy state historic preservation officer, follows the journey of each mural to its completion.

The book cover, above, depicts a section of the mural commissioned for the Auburn Post Office and painted by Ethel Magafan.
